There is a strong, almost irresistible, tendency for a writer, struggling with a story, to see a character as a person, rather than as a personification of a theme, or as a symbol of a social class, or as a type. The writer's own feelings for the character, or his or her own identification with the character, may be the cause of this. But it is also a natural result of the writer's desire to create a living, breathing character, one who can move and act and think and feel as a real person. The writer's own feelings for the character, or his or her own identification with the character, may be the cause of this. But it is also a natural result of the writer's desire to create a living, breathing character, one who can move and act and think and feel as a real person.
